HUMANITY to the ship wrecked and the eastaway is what we have a right to expect from every people with any pretensions to civilisation or ability to recognise their duty to their fellows. Man in a purely savage state is a predatory being, whose first instinct is to benefit himself without regard for the wants or sufferings of others; but with any form of civilisation comes an inevitable respect for property, and, following that, a feeling of compassion for those in distress. Mariners were formerly exposed to much more peril from man's inhumanity than at present when shipwrecked on a strange shore. but there are still, unfortunately, many inhospitable coasts where the danger is greater than that to be apprehended from the pitiless storm or the angry sea. The Chinese were old times distinguished for the with which they treated shipwrecked foreigners, and the Coreans have quite recently been guilty of most cruel conduct to those whom the elements cast on their shores. But the Chinese have within the last few years displayed a very different spirit is this respect. and in numerous cases have shown great kindness and liberality to the shipwrecked. On the Formosan coast the aborigines have on several occasions behaved with great barbarity to the crews of vessels driven on the rocks, and it was on account of the cowardly murder of some Loochooans thrown on that shore that the Japanese despatched their famous expedition to the island. Germany, during the negotiations for the arrangement of the Anna affair, taught the Chinese Government a salutary lesson in this direction and instructions were, after the settlement of that case, issued to all ithe mandarins to befriend any vessels in distress on the coasts.

The N. C. Daily News says: - A private letter has been received in Shanghai from Colonel Gordon. It was posted at Adon, and its contenis, we understand, are to the effect that the Colonel had given up the idea, at least for the present, of proceeding to Zanzibar. He was going on to England without delay.

The Imperial Japanese Government have (says Engineering) entered into competition with the paper manufacturers of this country, and are experting the preduce of their mills at Tokic to the agency they have established in London. They undertake to supply every description of paper, and judging from samples, they can manufacture paper of a very high quality as regards surface, uniformity, and strength. One kind especially is remarkable for its parchment-like texture and strength. The prices quoted average nearly 2s. a pound, or from 14s. to 75s, per ream. according to the variations in weight. These prices will probably prove probibitory except under special circumstances.

The two lodies, Miss Wilson and Miss Fausset, who ventured alone on a long journey to the north-west, have arrived in safety at Hanchung-fu, in Shensi-a feat which would have been quite impossible but a few lyears ago. In one place he mentions having met four Coreans, who were bringing to Mr. Mac-Intere, at Newchwang, a further supply of Co. rean books, which were well bound in parchment. and on better paper than the Chinese use. These books established Mr. MacIntyre in what was little more than his theory before, viz., that the Coreans have a perfect system of signs, which, attached to the Chinese characters, render any Chinese book readable and intelligible to an educated Corean, A Corean convert, named Tsway, it may be incidentally mentioned, is now engaged in translating the New Tostament and "The Pilgrim's Progress" into his native

THE BUTCHER AND HIS LOVE. A butcher loved a tender maid. To woo her were his designs, And he sent her copies of gushing verse, In fact, real tender loins: The girl, alas! he could not stat. She would love him as a brother, But when implored to marry, said, "Trips, please, and find another." The butcher still pursued the girl, His pleas became much bolter; The girl, at last, to find relief, Gave to him a cold shoulder. He knew then that his hopes were vain, But as he left her said ;

" Since you have caused me such distress T'll haunch you when I'm dead.' He pined and grew so thin and pale, He felt his ond was nigh, But his woo was such he did not know Whother to live or die. He tried in drink to drown his cares. And there found no relief; But daily grow more weebegone, You never enusage grief: At last his weary soul found rest His sorrows now are o'er;
